EDITOR: Since a very great number of those engaged in family research must, at some time, direct their efforts to the records of the State of Indiana the following article is included in this issue in the hope that it will make this endeavor less painful and time consuming.

"COURTHOUSE' CATASTROPHES IN INDIANA"

There has been considerable loss of county records in Indiana due to natural catastrophes. It may be useful to list the counties in Indiana where there is a lack of early records.

Boone, organized in 1830. Fire in 1856 destroyed Recorder's office. There are nine volumes of "Deeds Heretofore Recorded" which to some degree replace those which were lost.

Brown, organized 1836. Fire in 1873. Clerk's office survived. Records in other offices spotty.

Clay, organized 1825. Fire in 1851. Only Recorder's office survived.

Daviess, organized 1817. Fire in 1879. Will record books, prior to 1854, seem to be the most serious loss.

Dearborn, organized 1803. Fire in 1826. A few record series begin as early as 1824. Some of these records now survive only on microfilm as there was a flood in 1937.

Dekalb, organized 1837. Fire in 1913. Probate records prior to 1850's appear to be worst loss.

Dubois, organized in 1830. Fire in 1839. No record books from any office appear to have survived. However, an inventory made in 1937 is listed in the Clerk's office: 225 file boxes of papers pertaining to civil cases.... dating from 1816. There were also 98 file boxes of papers pertaining to criminal cases...dating from 1816. This might seem to be an error, but the same inventory lists in the Recorder's office 10 file boxes of deeds dating from 1812.

Jasper, organized in 1838. Fire in 1864 destroyed all records except those in Recorder's office. There did exist in the records of the County Commissioners two volumes entitled: Evidence of Destroyed Records." These books are indexed.

JOHNSON, Organized in 1823. Fire in 1849 and 1874. Marriages prior to 1830 lacking. Probate Order Books prior to 1830 lost, but Complete Probate Record Books exist from 1823.

Knox, organized 1790. Fire in 1814. Records of the Recorder's office are lacking prior to that date. Several early deeds are re-recorded. Marriages exist from 1807, Wills from 1808...many records from 1790's.

Madison, organized 1823. Fire in 1880. Recorder's office not damaged. Clerk's Office; marriages, will, etc., destroyed.

Miami, organized 1834. Fire in 1843. Deed records seem to have survived, as well as a Minute Book of the County Commissioners which dates from 1834.

Morgan, organized 1822. Fire in 1876. Most records were restored. Marriages should be used with caution. Probate records are far from complete.

Noble, organized 1836. Fire in 1843 and 1859. Deed records are intact. No records in Clerk's office prior to 1859.

Parke, organized 1821. Fire in 1833. All records destroyed. Deed records were restored as far as possible.

Spencer, organized 1818. Fire in 1833. The only records to survive seem to be the deeds and marriages.

Sullivan, organized 1817. Fire in 1850. The Deeds burned, but there is a "Record of Destroyed Deeds." In a close examination of an inventory of records of Sullivan County, it is found that there once existed a series of records, "Record of Sale Bills," dating from 1837. These books contained a record of sales of personal estates of deceased persons by the executor, showing article, amount of sale, to whom sold, etc. If these still exist, they should be salvaged at once.

Tipton, organized 1844. Fire in 1857. Recorder's office is intact. There was some minor losses in the Probate Court records.

Wayne, organized 1811. Has had no fire. Marriages exist from 1811, Wills from 1812 and Commissioner's records from 1811 - yet no other records are known to exist prior to 1818.

White, organized in 1834. Damaged by tornadoes 1974, record loss was minimal.

18TH CENTURY MARRIAGE CUSTOMS IN

THE ILLINOIS COUNTRY

Marriage in the Illinois Country was a matter of concern both to the government and to the church. There were never enough eligible girls in the country; the Illinois habitants and officers for the most part refused to marry the girls whom the Company of the Indies had picked from the Paris streets. Chassin, the garde magazin, in 1722, suggested that girls might easily be sent from Canada, but that "a libertine who came from there makes the officers fear other girls might be the same." As late as 1752 Maccarty was writing to Governor Vaudreuil that:

"The principle of it is to send fruitful stock, if you wish increase, for we have many men who cannot set up housekeeping for want of girls. The Creoles of this country won't deign to look at a soldier. Their easy life gives them big ideas. If you could send some girls from the foundlings or the hospitals of France to give to the discharged soldiers, they might become fruitful vines, instructed in the principles of religion, who would accept their situation and would in the end make good inhabitants, if things were made easier for them the first two years. But I am much afraid they would be corrupted on their way through the lower colony."

Few widows remained widows long. It was common for an inventory of the late husband's goods and a marriage contract between the widow and another habitant to be drawn up, on the same day. Bans of course, had to be published at high mass on three successive Sundays, which usually meant that the next marriage did not take place for at least two weeks. But sometimes one or two of the bans were dispensed with by the priest; marriages did take place occasionally immediately after the reading of the first ban. Even the Lenten prohibitions were frequently lifted to allow the ceremony. Apparently the only widow in Kaskaskia who did not remarry was Marie Claire Catois; whose husband, Leonard Billeron, royal notary, died in 1740. She was known as the Widow la Fatigue from Billeron's nickname; she raised four sons and a daughter - Leonard, Pierre, Joseph, Marianne and Jacques - kept lodgers, and made trips to New Orleans to look after her affairs there.

French-Indian marriages were common in the early days of Kaskaskia, but they were not at all to the liking of the Company of the Indies or later to the royal ministers. On December 18, 1728, a decree of the Canadian Superior Council, made in view of a statement by Father Boulanger, cure of Kaskaskia, ordered that the property of Indian wives who died without issue should go to the Company. These women were not to have the disposal of any real property remaining after the death of their French husbands, but were to be paid an annual pension of one-third of the revenue of such property. The remaining two-thirds was to be divided among the heirs, or failing these, was to be administered by the curator for vacant estates. All French-Indian marriages were prohibited pending a decision of the king. An edict forbidding all such marriages in the future without the consent of the governor, intendant, commissary, or commandant of the post of the Illinois, was issued October 8, 1735.

Father Tartarin of Kaskaskia protested; only by legitimate marriages could the whole problem of illegitimate half-breeds be overcome. Children of marriages sanctified by the church, by their French upbringing and inheritance from their fathers, he reported, were more French than Indian, and in twenty years only one child of such an alliance had returned to the wilderness. Possibly he was referring to Michael, son of Michael Aco and Marie Rouensa, whom his mother disinherited for giving up French ways and joining the savages in the forests. On the other hand, according to Tartarin, bastards were left without education or any hope of an inheritance; these were the ones who made trouble for the French. As for the young Frenchmen who were living with their Indian slaves, "to the scandal of the community," they should be forced to marry.

But apparently the order was never revoked; there were few Indian wives in Kaskaskia in 1763, though a large part of the population had Indian blood in their veins.

Army officers were beset with difficulties when they tried to marry. No matter their rank, they all had to get official permission from the government first. There was so much red tape that often the betrothal was broken before the consent finally arrived; sometimes merely a whim on the governor's part prohibited a union.

In every marriage, before the religious ceremony could take place, a marriage contract had to be made before the royal notary. By the contract a community was established consisting of all the movable property owned by each party on the day of the marriage; after the celebration of the marriage, no other valid contract could be made altering its terms in any respect. Either party could, however, dissolve the contract at will; tacit consent of both parties was all that was then needed to re-establish it. Administration of the joint property belonged to the husband who could dispose of any of it so long as he did so in good faith with no intention of defrauding his wife. Any property, movable or immovable, acquired after the marriage, became a part of the community, and was disposed of at the dissolution of the contract according to its terms.

In most contracts, it was stipulated that the wife could at any time renounce the community and take back any property she had acquired either through inheritance or by gift together with her dowry and preciput. There was at least one such case in Kaskaskia. On February 1, 1751, in the absence of her husband, Victoire Claude, wife of Louis Cabassier, petitioned Buchet for permission to renounce the community between herself and her husband. Her patrimony having been absorbed by debts contracted by Cabassier before their marriage, she asked that a settlement be made by which she would be reimbursed.

An important part of the contract provided for the dower and the preciput. The dower, which should not be confused with the bride's dowry which her father paid to the husband at the time of the marriage, was of two kinds, the douaire coutumier and the douaire prefix. The first, under the custom of Paris, was a usufruct on half of the movables owned by the husband at the time of the marriage; according to the terms of the contract, it was paid to the widow either as a lump sum upon the husband's death, or in annual installments throughout her lifetime. Usually the amount was reduced if she remarried.

The more common type of dower in the Illinois country was the douaire prefix, a certain sum stipulated in the contract, and payable to the widow in addition to her rights in the division of the estate.

The preciput, its amount definitely stated in the contract, went to the survivor of the community, whether husband or wife. Included with it was the right of that person to take out free of debt any property in personal use; wearing apparel, jewelry, arms, and so forth.

Other provisions of the contract regulated the inheritance, especially if there were children of another marriage; in that connection also, there was an agreement concerning the support and education of any minor children by the wife's previous marriage.
